"When grief takes hold, you monster through it."

By David in Rochester

The poems in this book can be brutal. Rachel McKibbens is well known in the world of slam, a tradition that values maximum impact, and movement. That's what her poems do. They hit. And they tell stories economically and fiercely. But, far from the unadorned first-person narratives people sometimes associate with slam, they are sophisticated, rich in images that carry specific tactile and visual and symbolic power, and precise in their language choices.

The subject matters of the poems in this book include lust, infidelity, vengeance, and predation. There are broken children. There are all the various forms that loneliness takes (spurned love, widowhood, motherlessness), and always the yearning for tenderness and connection.

Some are explicit and some hard to read, but images that start by assaulting often crack open to reveal another layer of possibility. This quality of surprise, along with the lusciousness of the language itself, promises a kind of redemption. Her world is a knife-edged and a dark one, but never static, and because there is constant transformation, there is always hope.

In a recent interview at Tin House, McKibbens said, "My life has always been a fairytale. More Grimm than Mother Goose." That quote captures an essential feeling conveyed by the poems in this book and the landscape they describe. As far as I remember, there are no pet goats being cut open, or birds pecking sisters' eyes out here, but there may as well be. Magic and violence and animals and images of transformation are abundant. In that regard, her debt to Anne Sexton is clear. If you like her stuff, I bet you'll like this.

a cultural touchstone

By Anne E. Mcwilliams

rachel mckibbens is the top drawer of young women writing about their childhood experiences. her poetry is not for the faint of heart, or the gentility who prefer to act as if only perfectly polite things happen in life. mckibbens gives voice to the horrific experiences of the invisible with breathtaking beauty. i followed her for years on facebook. she is a power to be reckoned with. we will hear from her for years. she is the leader of a new and wonderful group of feminists, full of passion and skill, creating stories of consequence.
